Remembering

You cry of my loss,
and I don't know why.
My greatest goal,
was of to be where I am.
Why do you cry?
I am happy.
Why are you not?
Do not remember me
with tears and sorrow.
For I am closer, than I ever was.
I am a hot summer day,
as you cool yourself
under our old Maple tree.
I am a chilly fall evening, as the sun sets behind the winter stricken horizon.
I am a cold winter night,
as the snow falls
silently to the ground.
I am a fresh spring morning,
a sign of new life.
Do not remember me,
with tears and sorrow.
But please, remember me,
The next time you smile.

tmr

You stand before them, afraid of all you are.
You stand alone,
just one more lonely figure in this crowd of empty faces.
You strive to be unique and stand for what you are.
You follow in interest and unite in a circle.
Only to find the circle incomplete.
without your completeness.
They unite as one with you but are a mere fraction without.
A much needed figure in this crowd of empty faces.

Varsity Cheerleaders

The Varsity Six this year, was busier than usual; they painted signs, planned assemblies, and supported all athletic events of Eldorado. Their spirit and enthusiasm was shown by letting all of the teams know that they were behind them all the way. They participated in building up spirit at pep rallys and assemblies. The girls did a wonderful job and it can be said that they made 1977-78 a great year.

Yell leaders

The Yell leaders, this year, have contributed many things to our school, especially their spirit. Their zany personalities helped us through our bad times, as well as our good. They participated at all football games, cheering our team on, as well as the audience. They were one bunch of Yell leaders, and hopefully Eldorado will have more like them in the years to come.

House of Representatives

The members of the House of Representative has helped Eldorado by informing the student body of various proposals made in the Senate. Some of these proposals were restricting the parking lot to only juniors and seniors, to distribute lockers smoothly next year, and taking a survey to see if the student body approved of S.S.R. For a young organization, they are doing a good job.

House of Representatives: Linda Kimball, Tony Snyder, Jim Griffith, Brian Hatfield, Jeri Brane, Dena Roybal, Suzanne Monson, Juvie Ortiz, Jill Domina, Rochelle Randall, Rhonda Trask, Phillip Mitchell, Donna Clapper, Kim Kutzley, Ken Bader, Killi Williams, Traci Westbrook, Ginger Marsh, Jodi Sanzari, Darla Lawence, Sue Taylor, Chris Ketterer, Margaret Meese, Mike Witiuk, Parker Parrish, Stephen Shipley, Kate Sarason, Brian Crockett, Ingrid Nelson, Yvonne Sandoval, Heidi Aragon, Mary Alires, Craig Wexler, Karen Winters, Kathy Parker, Tracie Frye, Cheryl Blaine, Glen O'Banion, Greg Boldue, Judy Austin, Roddy Dambrino, Greg Schamp, Paul Herman, Juanita Talley, Denise Bundrant, Shary Dustin, Kim Kemper, Bill Rouse, Brad Lawson, Lourdes Lopez, Claudia Barnes, John Kane, Jeff Butler, Pat Bolduc, Robert Brittenham, Bobbi Thomspon, Renee Hinde, Joe Gallegos, Mark Fowler, Karen Oudlette, Larry Hendricks, Tom Johnson, Randy Pepple, Brenda Weatherill, Stephen Shaefer, Michael Green, JoAnne Leal, Susan Grant, Linda Marie Lawson, Holli Milsap, Mark Waldrop, Adair Barnes, Pam Parenti, Mary Quinn, Cathy Alderete, Mary Scahill, Pat Pierce, Andy Williams, Carla Gonzales, Mary Hubbar, Karen Sapon, Ron Tiley, Debbie Goldammer, Chris Wagner, Marianne Roberts, Susan Bustamante, Sally Moya, Robert Nesom, Shelly Hauduitz, Ronald Cox, Mike Mazzello, Pat Holloway, Julie Bartlett, Pat Cating, Jeff Butler, Brad Pierce, Ronald Nasci, Mark Fratrick, Mike Mitchell, Shawna Clear, Mary Margaret Brandt, Cathy Crichton, Amy Burg, Phyllis Lioce, Lisa Bumgarner, Robert Alexander.

The El Conquistador de Eldorado newspaper staff is an organization which publishes a monthly paper. High school journalists must work around the world of the campus, but must realize students are people also, with outside activities, interests, and ideas. The staff supports itself by sales of advertisement and of newspapers.

Literary Magazine

First Row: Dianne Phelan, Chris Garcia, Mike Nixon, Katherine Johnson, Kim Weddle. Second Row: Art Jacobs, Brenda Fox, Lynn Roach, Mrs. Church, Mrs. Sleeter, Leslea Pike, Debbie Hutchins.

Mountainsong, Eldorado's first literary magazine, was formed by a group of students interested in publishing Eldorado's writers and artists creativity. The staff compiled and made the initial selections, which were then judged by a panel of teachers, who made the final choices for awards and publication. The staff wishes to thank all of those contributors, both published and unpublished, who made this first edition possible.

DECA

DECA is Distributive Education Clubs of America. Its purpose is to promote leadership in individuals through the understanding of our country, our economic system and business as it is today. Students compete with other high school students in many career areas of Business Administration as well as marketing manuals. DECA does many free enterprise activities each year. This year, DECA created and illustrated coloring books on free enterprise and then visited grade schools in the area with a clown free enterprise show for the children. Members appear on local television shows promoting free enterprise, and speak to many of the local civic organizations.

VICA

VICA is the Vocational Industrial Clubs of America. It is a national organization of individuals involved in co-educational, secondary, and post secondary vocational industrial education. This includes students in trade, industrial, technical, and health education courses that are vocationally and occupationally oriented. VICA is the only national organization whose purpose is to serve vocational industrial youth. Several fund raising activities were held by the VICA club. The money raised by their efforts is contributed to a scholarship fund and a portion is put in the club's treasury for other VICA activities. Time and effort has also been donated by VICA members to helping senior citizens.

Thespians

The "77-78" season for theatre has been the most successful in Eldorado's history, thus far. The drama clubs presented the first production, in New Mexico high school history, of Hamlet, which proved to be a great success. Other shows which were performed are Once Upon A Mattress, The Man Who Came to Dinner, and a new science-fiction production entitled Wake to the Stars. This year Eldorado was invited to and attended drama festivals at UNM, ENMU, and New Mexico State University. Also, Thespian Troupe (272) was one of sixty high schools in the nation asked to perform at the International Thespian Conference in Muncie, Indiana this summer. It's been a great season and hopefully in the future, there will be more support for Eldorados' ever improving theatre arts program.

We all are the same.
Yet all know our differences.
We strive for a goal.
Yet fight as a unit.
Together in victory.
Together in defeat.
We share in the joy of the search for our limit.
Yet we share in the joy of knowing no limit.
We strived for a goal
and won as a unit.
We rose in victory and knew no defeat.

Character—This word seems to best describe this year's team. We were young, and we were inexperienced. But, this sterling character came through for us, and we were able to overcome this immaturity and inexperience. We had a super year! We had one of the toughest schedules of any team in the State, and our season's record was 7-3. We were 5-1 in district play, and we won the District 2AAAA Championship. We went to the State Playoffs for the 5th straight year, losing in the quarterfinals to fortuitous Farmington.

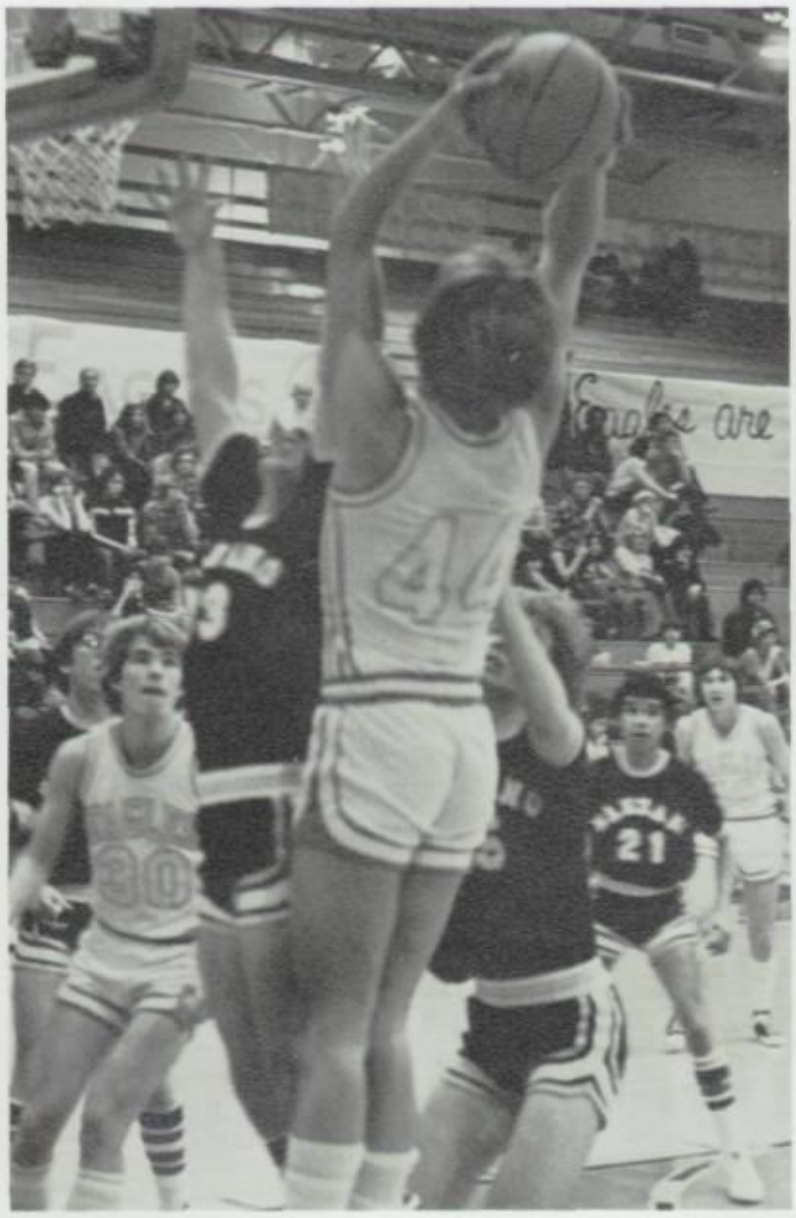
The 1978 Eldorado Basketball Team had great hopes for this year. Returning a strong squad from last year, we were ready to play. We started out slowly this year, but we never counted ourselves out, and we came back to the best season that Eldorado has ever had.

We would like to thank Coach Snider, Coach Porkorski, and Coach McCall for all their help and guidance throughout the year. We would also like to thank all of the students and fans who came out and supported us.

The Team



JV Basketball

Our 1978 Junior Varsity BB team had a very successful season this year. We finished it with a 20-1 win-loss record and brought home district and city place trophies.

We feel with such a successful season that we are good building blocks for our next year's Golden Eagle team.

We would like to thank Coach Pokorski for his support and time.

The "C" Team started out with a strong 10-2 win-loss record, but injuries and some hard luck hit and we finished at 12-9. However, you can't measure what kind of season we had by the record alone. Under Coach McCall's guidance every player on the team made tremendous progress. We would like to thank him for his hard work and encouragement. This team will provide a sound varsity in the years to come.

The Wrestling season this year, under the direction of tri-captains Butch White, Jeff Dorwart and Tim Ottmann, involved a lot of work and cooperation. Our success this year can be contributed to the culminated efforts of both Coach Evans, and JV Coach Romero building and teaching the varsity program. This is Coach Evans first season of graduating seniors, and along with the team have achieved a dual record of 31-7 in the past three years. Four years of varsity experience were contributed by both Butch (a state place winner), and Jeff (a state champion), along with past Varsity team-members Tim Richardson, Kevin Johnston, Ron Emrick, and Scott Johnson. All that have participated in the Wrestling program wish to thank Coach Evans and Coach Romero for the time, effort and encouragement they have given to us all.

The team this year placed second in the State meet. The girls put in many hard hours preparing for that meet and finished very well in it. The swimmers would practice twice a day, once before school and then again after school. We would like to thank Jole Martin and Ron Rhinehart for all of their help. The divers would also like to thank Kirby Jefferson for his help with the diving. This year the team is only losing 3 swimmers and 2 divers. Next year will be another good year again for the girls.

Varsity Track

This year's Eldorado track team was young and talented, and with the help of Coach Durward Stell and Vic Moore, the Eagles were one of the most sought after teams in the city. The experience came from the returning lettermen Miltie Clark, Michael Garcia, Anthony Sosa, and John Micsko. We feel this was one of Eldorado's most successful years.

Faces come and go with the passing of every minute
Our teachers step into our lives
but only for a moment,
A moment to the rest of all time.
They touch our existence leaving on us, the print of all they know.
They show us what they will,
then quickly
in the passing of a minute
we are on our way.
They conduct our every day
but only for a moment
a moment to the rest of all time.

The desire for wisdom.
the search for happiness.
the longing for success.
all of this was deeply implanted in our consciousness.
the happiness
in our youthful faces.
the sadness
in our glistening tears.
Our last year to laugh. rollick.
and enjoy.
Tomorrow we had to decide what do we want to do.
The end . . . no . . .
the beginning.

Seniors

In an attempt to better represent the Senior Class, the Senior Class Cabinet was left open to all seniors this year. Thirty hard working seniors who are now on cabinet have participated in various fund-raising drives. Their goal: a Senior Class gift that the whole school will be proud of. The highlight of the year was a beautiful Homecoming '77 dance, which was put together by Senior Cabinet. The Senior Cabinet of the Class of '78 has worked very hard, and their efforts have been rewarded.

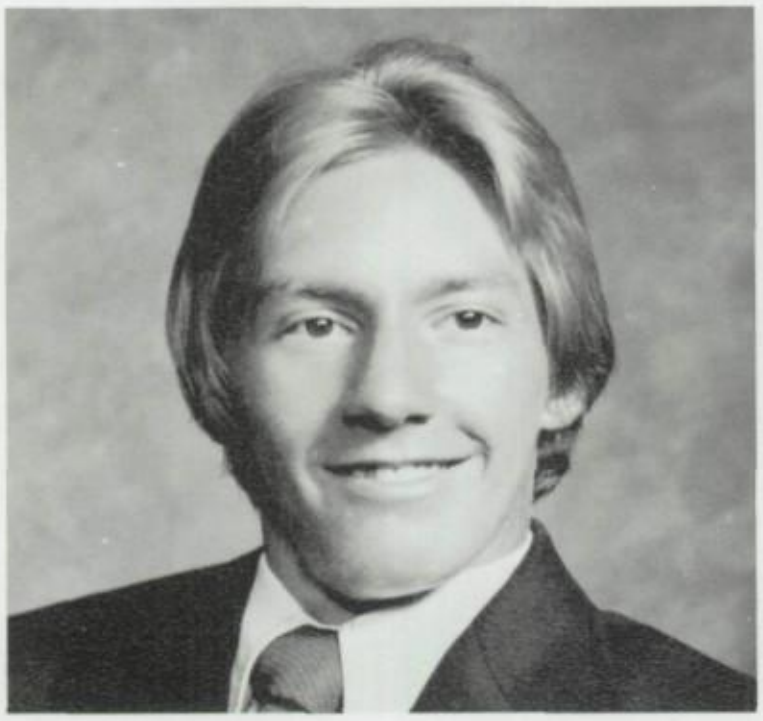
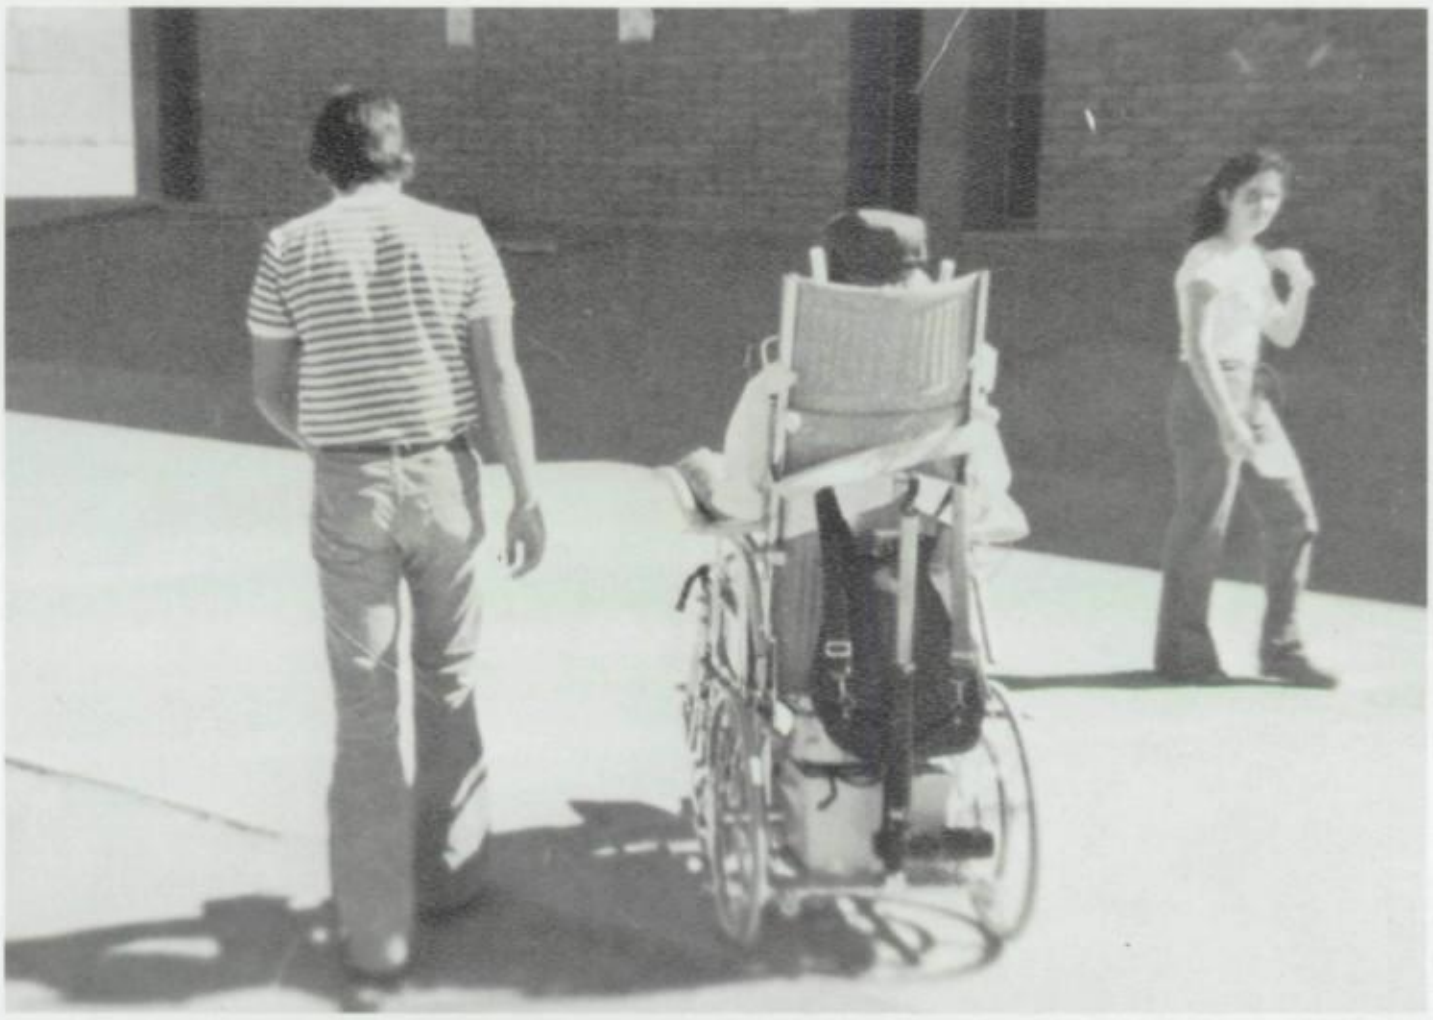
Mark Hoeberling





. . .shared his senior year with us.

We seek a challenge,
yet when set before us
we are afraid, afraid of the emptiness we must face.

Still we will step forward knowing that time will fill this gap and fill the darkness of fear with the light of knowing.
Now we can smile on the past,
and look for the future;
but live for the present,
for didn't we seek the challenge?

Junior

To start off the year, the Junior Class had a car wash in August and September, they sponsored a volley-ball marathon, where the Jr, House played for 12 continuous hours non-stop. Other projects to make money for prom were the raffle tickets for a $100 gift certificate, and collecting plastic buckets from restaurants throughout the year to sell at the flea market.

The Junior Class also sold carnations during February for Valentines Day. Among other contributions, the Junior Class sold candy, t-shirts, held bake sales, and sponsored a dance before the prom and then the prom itself.

The Sophomore Class of '80 bought one-third of the flowers for EHS Homecoming and did half the reception with the Junior Class. We presented gifts to the Queen and the Princesses. We sold sugar daddys and candy canes and the rest of '80 T-shirts. There was a car wash and the Valentine Dance. We had the reception after the honor assembly for the graduating class with the help of the Freshmen Class.

The class officers and board members have worked this year to pay off all of our bills and start earning money needed for the Junior Senior Prom.

They were the first class ever to decorate the foyer of the gym for the homecoming ceremonies. No funds were available to finance the project, so they dug into their pockets in order to buy supplies for the decorations.

The Freshman Forum is a group of students involved in helping the freshman class officers organize activities. The freshman class officers would like to extend their thanks to the forum for their help throughout the year. Together, the officers and Forum worked hard to make this an enjoyable and memorable year for all freshmen.

The class of '81 has been one of the most active and spirited groups of students Eldorado has ever had. They proved themselves to be outstanding in the areas of scholastic and athletic achievements. The freshman class sponsored money raising activities throughout the year.

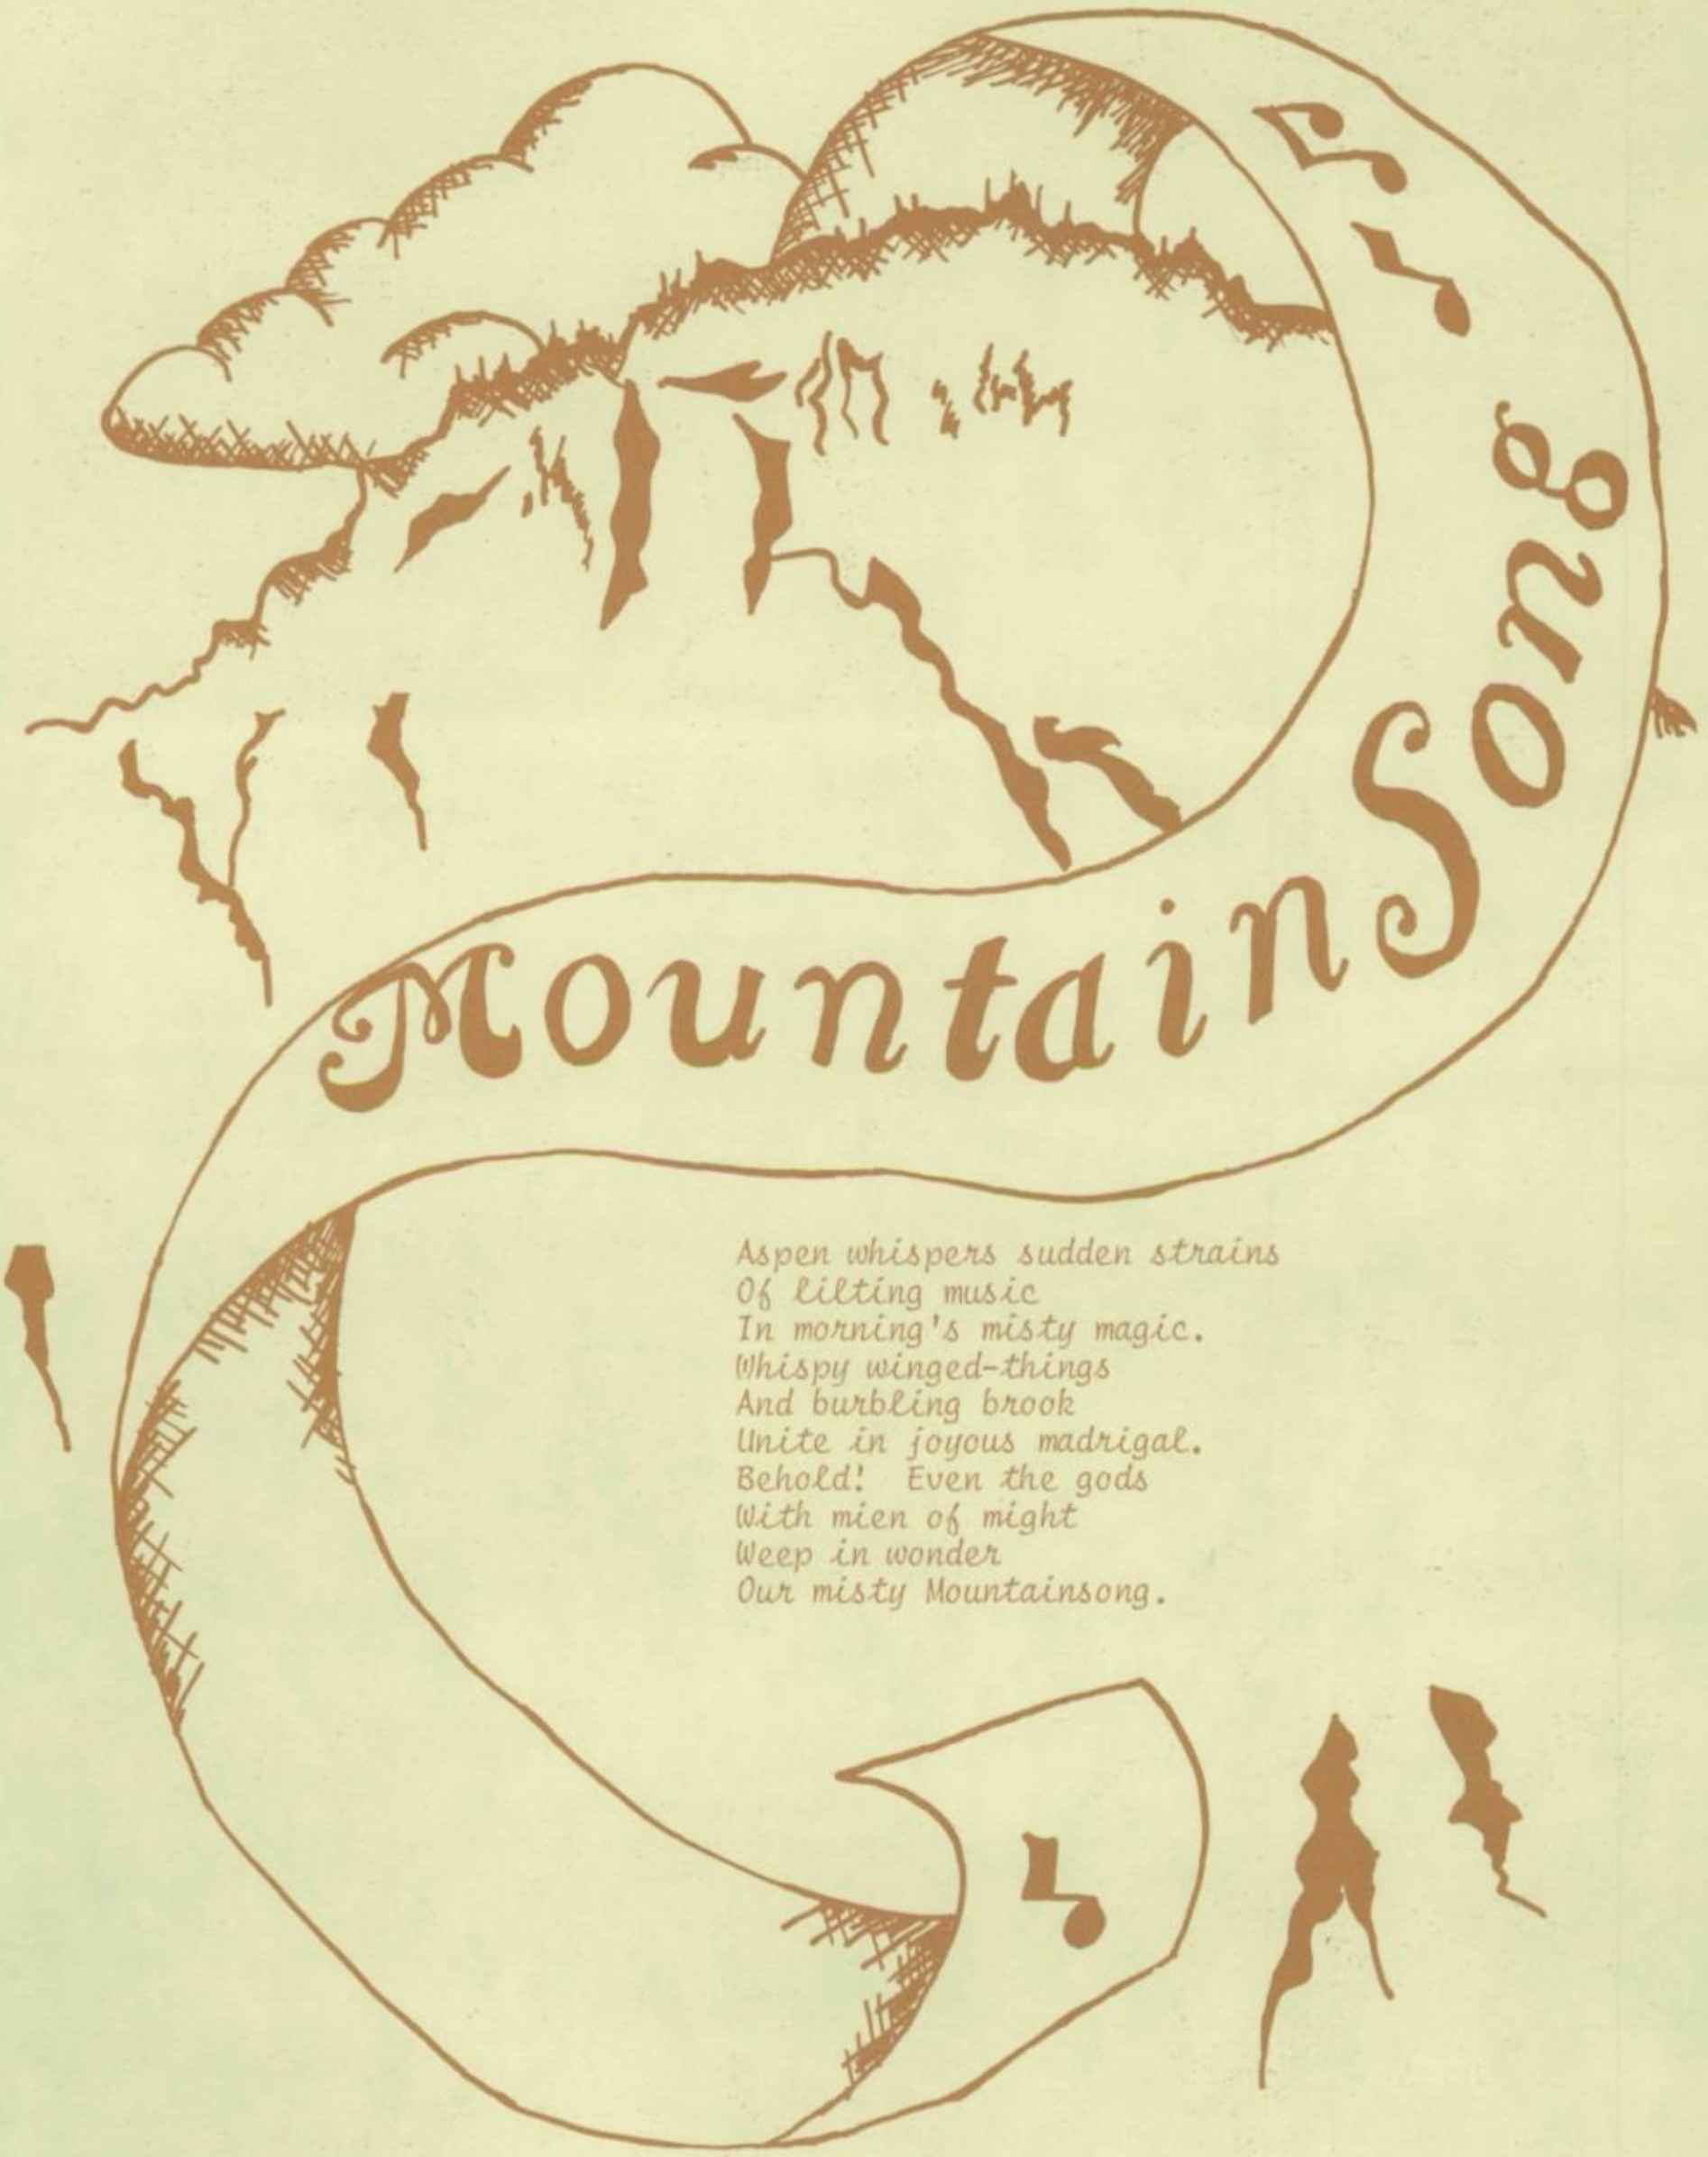
Jenny



Aspen whispers sudden strains
Of lilting music
In morning's misty magic.
Whispy winged-things
And burbling brook
Unite in joyous madrigal.
Behold! Even the gods
With mien of might Weep in wonder
Our misty Mountainsong.

Our National Pastime

Baseball, baseball, in the sky,
Why did you ever fly so high?
As I jog to first, you hang up there Being suspended in the air
That man out there is under you
When he makes the catch, our team is through!
Please trip, or someone grab his hands
I can hear the rumbling in the stands.
The ball starts down, oh no! Please wait!
This game is dumb, this sport I hate!
Why don't I quit? It makes no sense!
Hey look! It landed past the fence!

Oh joy! Hurrah! I hit a home run!
Boy, this baseball sure is fun!
I touch all the bases; first, second, third, home.
The stands are cheering for me alone!
As I cross the plate, at the scoreboard I glance.
We're nine runs down. We haven't a chance.

Treasure Hunter

According to the map, the treasure was buried three steps north of the rock. The rock was easy enough to find, for it was the only protuberance on the beach along the entire length of the shore. Since the sun was dropping toward the western horizon, it was easy to see that north was straight ahead. However, the treasure hunter wanted to be absolutely positive of his direction, so, from his hip pocket, he slowly drew forth his compass. Patiently, he waited until the needle came to a complete stop. According to the compass, north was straight ahead.

Then, carefully and precisely, the treasure hunter counted off three paces north, placing one foot exactly in front of the other. One, two, three—this had to be the spot. Now, all he had to do was to dig until he hit something hard, and then he could unearth the treasure. Once again, he glanced quickly at the map. Then, with his big toe, he marked a big "x" in the sand. Thoughtfully, he sank to his knees and began to dig.

On top, the sand was dry and warm, but as the hole enlarged, it became cool and moist. The digger neatly placed the shovelfuls of sand into piles around the edge of the hole.

The sinking sun still shone brightly on the treasure hunter, and it burned his naked back. But a light breeze cooled him and dried the sweat on his upper lip.

As he dug, he imagined what the treasure chest would look like. It would be of gold, he thought, and it would shine like the sun. On the outside, the chest might be studded with diamonds, rubies and emeralds—or it might just be plain gold. But the inside was what mattered. All he would have to do would be to put the gold key into the lock. Then, with just a twist, the lid would spring open and reveal the round, gold coins. Coins, yes, millions and millions of gold coins would be inside. He could even feel them in his hands and hear them clinking together. Money, just what he wanted.

I'll be rich," he said, "rich, really rich."

But then, with a start, he came out of his reverie. His shovel had hit something hard and metallic. This was the treasure! He had found it!

But, at the same time, he heard a voice calling from the distance.

"Billy, come on," called the voice. "It's getting late, and we're going to get caught in all the traffic. Billy!"

"Oh, mom," pleaded the treasure hunter, "Mom!"

"William Thurman," cried the mother, now with a threatening tone, "you come here right now or else you'll walk home."

"But it's a real treasure!"

"Now!" she yelled. "I'm tired of your constant pretending. I'm leaving now. Let's go!" And with that, she turned and walked away.

Longingly, the treasure hunter stared down at the top of a gold box at the bottom of the hole. Slowly, he got up and began to run toward his mother. Then, with one final glance back at the hole, he disappeared in the shadows.

Meanwhile, the sun sank lazily into the horizon. At the same time, a strong breeze lifted up a treasure map, scribbled with blue and green crayons, and blew it across the sand and into the water. The incoming tide reached out along the shore and cascaded into a large hole, filling it with sand and water.

Night Games

Suspended in the cold remote heavens, the stars overhead glittered as they regarded us. We huddled in a large circle—lithe, impatient young bodies jostling each other for space, excited voices ringing through the empty street. A solitary street lamp cast its yellow circle of light on the bent heads of tangled hair.

"One potato, two potato, three potato, four,"a thirteen-year-old voice decided my fate in a singsong chant. I glanced at the voice; the seniority of seven years was an awesome authority in a child's world. Eyes closed in concentration, I held my breath and hoped desperately for the words, "You're out!" One by one the lucky ones were counted out and they ducked from the circle to congregate in small groups, whispering and giggling in anticipation. At each departure my heart skipped a beat and my fists clenched tighter. Finally the remaining fists were narrowed down to two. I stared with glassy eyes as the definitive "You're out" was pronounced and the leader passed sentence on me. "You're It." The groups laughed derisively, dispering in all directions. Fragments of speech drifted to my ears, "She always gets picked," " . . . not really old enough to play", " . . . just Danny's tagalong little sister". I walked slowly over to the street lamp, hid my eyes, and began to count in an unsteady voice, "One, two, three . . . " As the street emptied I continued to count in whispers, stretching each number as far as I dared. " . . . 48, 49, 50". I clung to the dark safe haven of my tightly closed eyes for a moment, turned, and in a quavering voice yelled the traditional "Apple, peaches, pumpkin pie; who's not ready, holler aye."

An encroaching silence greeted me on all sides. I pivoted, surveying the murky street. Then I ventured hesitantly out of the warm security of the street lamp's circle of light. I crept up the street, as if into a certain ambush, casting fearful glances left and right, my tennis shoes slapping softly on the smooth sidewalk. A twig snapped to my right. I wheeled, my heart in my throat—above me a menacing face leered out of the blank sky. Stifling a scream, I turned to my left. They were approaching me, their outlines faint and wavery in the night. Insidiously soft voices surrounded me, threatened me, murmuring words that I couldn't hear, didn't want to hear. My heart pounded through my worn tee-shirt as my eyes gazed feverishly at the advancing spectral mob. Soon their malicious staring eyes founds mine. Suddenly, control of my tensely rigid body returned, and I raced frantically toward the safety of the light. Wraith-like hands snatched and clawed at my clothes, tentacles grasping to halt my flight. I stumbled and they closed in on me, their whispers low and menacing in my ears, their icy arms reaching for an encompassing embrace. Regaining my footing, I leapt away from them and sprinted for the street lamp. Finally I reached the circle of light and hurled myself, panting and heaving, into its engulfing warmth.

The other kids stood waiting for me, contempt written on their faces. Voices chimed in, "Come on, scaredy-cat, everyone's here already. You've lost again." Their mocking voices echoed in my throbbing head. "I didn't even have a good hiding place; it's easy to win when she's It." "Look at her, she's probably afraid to sleep without a nightlight, too." "Yeah. Well, chicken, are you going to play or are you afraid?"

Silently, I approached them as they made a circle. I gritted my chattering teeth, folded my trembling hands into two fists, and thrust them in front of me.

The stars hung in the enveloping night, sparkling benevolently above the street. "One potato, two potato, three potato, four," the leader's voice chanted, while I prayed for the magical words, "You're out."

First Place Story

the coming

The squirrels told of its coming nervously scurrying back and forth to quietly hide bits of food.

The sun told of its coming dimming down its radiant warmth its lights obscured by hazy clouds.

The trees told of its coming releasing bits of golden jewels to pile on the ground.

The wind told of its coming rattling through barren branches and teasing tufts of thick downy fur.

The birds told of its coming gathering in the sky like a grey arrow speeding south.

The brook told of its coming silencing its gentle murmur with a frozen sheet of ice.

Then
an almost tangible silence told that it had come.

Debbie Bryant

The Military Academy

Gold-bricked buildings rise straight, tall, angular, unyielding pointing their noses in the sky.
Windows, spotlessly clean filled with straight Venetian blinds framed by unscratched outlines of olive drab.
Lawns manicured to a formal stiffness, each crayon green blade forming a perfect row with the crayon green blade
in front of it,
broken only by the crisp sidewalk grey.
Oak trees shower the lawns with clouds of khaki-colored shade.

Cadets, like the buildings, and like each other rise straight, tall, angular, unyielding.
Clad in dull green khaki, spit-polished shoes with glimmering belt buckles and metal buttons.
Shorn hair accents expressionless faces.
Eyes, emotionless, reflecting only endless hours of marches and straight corners.

My heart longs to yell at them,
"Run! Scream! Play!
Scuff your shoes! Tear your pants! Roll in the grass!
Be human! Be alive!"

But I do not yell for I do not think they would hear through the silence.

Tomorrow's Child

A young boy lived in days of old
Amongst the forest deep and cold
Between tall trees he laughed and played,
The scented trees that softly swayed . . .

He lay and dreamt near moonlit pools
Or ran in fields the doe passed through On summer days when cools winds waft
Soft dewy scents on every draft.

Yet time moves on and never stills
Or cares the way a young man feels While youth flies by on falcon's wings
So swiftly now to manhood things.

The years did pass and brought along
This young man's son, so tough and strong
Who as a child did go and play
About the buildings, cold and gray.

With aimless mind he wanders round
Or meets his friends near junkyard mounds
Or plays beneath the hydrant sprays
Yet feels the heat of hot sun's rays.

But time moves on and never stills
Or cares the way the weary feel While life flies by on vulture's wings
So swiftly now to different things.

Tomorrow's child though yet unborn
Will walk upon the streets now worn . . .

Cactus

Cactus,
growing irregularly, poking spiny fingers
into the sky.
Cactus, growing wild,
without discipline
like a large, green, Brillo pad.
Encircled by small brown bushes that look like curled porcupines.
Separated by sand,
soft sand,
light sand,
loose sand that sinks
underfoot, and that blows
on eternal winds and in endless dustdevils.
With no houses,
no roads, no cars,
no humans.
No civilization for as far as you can see.
Only heat, intense, unrelenting heat that's visibly unforgiving to an intruder.
The desert deals death to those who try to conquer it and compromises with those who yield and respect it.

empty hallways lined with funny-blue lockers, lots of little creatures, with their square heads jammed into orderly little rows:
each with an earring hanging from its thin metal earlobe.
they all have 2 holes for a metal ID plate H202, H203, H204, the roll call goes—no names, just numbers.
the other lockers shrink, shocked, from those

Music of the Earth

The color of the world is played each morning with the rising sun by an orchestra whose instruments play the tints and hues of a thriving earth.

The flutes play pink the trumpets orange the cello brown and gold.

This symphony lasts until dusk then the instruments are put away all but a few
the piccolo to play the stars and the drums to sound the night.

Third Place Poem

The Wall

The Wall had been there longer than the memory of the people. It had always stood at the edge of their village, five times a man's height, its smooth black surface stretching out so far that no man could see its end; the polished stone reflecting the blazing rays of the twin suns onto the faces of the people kneeling before it. "The Wall is our guardian. We follow where it leads us. It provides for us and shelters us. The Wall is forever," the voices of the townspeople faithfully recited. One man stood; the crown of his head was shaven and stained black—as black as the Wall itself; his skin gleamed with oil. He held open a book, very old and very worn. The people all knew the words by heart, but it was comforting to hear the priest read from the book that had been written so long ago: "In the beginning was the Wall. . ."

Josef shifted impatiently. His gaze wandered to the carven steps on the face of the Wall behind the priest. He wondered where they led to, what was beyond the Wall. Oh, he knew what the people, the priests, and the Book said was beyond—a godsland, a world of wonders where your soul went after death. He didn't believe them. Neither did old Iban, Josef's grandfather. But then, Old Iban didn't believe in anything anymore, not even in the prayers the shaman recited over him to make him well.

"If I want to get well, I'll get well," Iban had wheezed, "and if I want to be sick, I'll be sick and no mumbling from a young fool like that one will get me well!"

"You want to be sick then, honorable grandfather?" Josef had asked, a bit playfully.

"Eh? Careful, boy—that tongue of yours will get you in trouble someday," Iban replied, mussing the boy's hair.

The old man was right, Josef reflected. His tongue had gotten him in trouble; he remembered the many beatings the priests had given him for his questions of his people's beliefs. Josef kept his questions to himself now, rather than face the priests' "answers" and the taunts of the other youths in the village at his shame.

A silence brought Josef out of his daydreaming. The priest had stopped reading, and the people sat with hands folded, praying. Josef glanced at the priest, who gave him a warning stare. Josef bent his head and pretended to pray.

Afterwards, the townspeople scattered back to their homes, the young children laughing and tumbling about, glad the services were over. Some of Josef's friends had banded together to play a game of stick-and-ball.

"Josef!" one cried. "Come with us." When Josef refused, "remembering" something he had to do at home, one of the boys called out, "Spoilsport!" and flung a handful of mud at him in jest. Josef ducked, grinned, and returned a handful at the boy, who soon had a large blotch on his clean kirt.

"Good shot, Josef!"

"Sure you won't join us? You've got the best aim of anyone here!"

In reply, Josef picked up another handful of mud and made like he would throw it at them.

"I know it, and if you all don't go on, I think I'll practice my aim a little with you as targets!"

The boys ran from him in mock terror and Josef, laughing, flung the mud after them and went home. Mara, his mother, was seated on the floor, making bread for their evening meal.

"Where's Grandfather?" he asked.

"He's with the priests, they're getting him ready for tomorrow," she said.

"Why? What's tomorrow? Anything special?"

She brushed her long copper hair back from her face. Her eyes danced a little as she answered. "Tomorrow's your grandfather's Festival."

Josef was stunned. "Festival? For Grandfather?"

"M-hm, and it's going to be the best one you'll ever see, Josef," she said.

Josef doubted that. Festivals had always been fun, but he had never really known any of the people they had been held for. This would be different.

Late that night, lying on his straw mattress, Josef watched the moons hanging in the sky and tried to count the stars. He gave up and went to sleep, wondering about what lay beyond the Wall.

Festival! The cry went ringing through the village. All up for Festival! Josef groggily dressed and splashed his face with cold water. Outside, after having eaten, Josef and Mara joined the crowd along the Wall. All the people wore bright colors, and they looked from a distance like handfuls of jewels lying on the sand. The Wall loomed above the people, its presence magnified by the role it would play at the Festival. A current of anticipation ran through the crowd and the morning service went quickly. Then the Festival began in earnest.

Josef joined the Games, competing for the golden crown, with which the winner would crown whomever he pleases King or Queen of the Festival. Josef was not a good runner, and scored poorly in all the races, but his strong arm and sure aim more than made up for his losses later.

"The winner of the crown is Josef, the grandson of Iban for whom the Festival is held!" cried the judge of the games. Josef, face flushed, took the gleaming crown and looked around the crowd.

"Who'll you give it to, Josef? Haran? I've seen the looks you gave her during the service," taunted one of Josef's friends. Josef turned even redder.

"I wasn't looking at her. I was looking at the Wall," Josef whispered back.

"Uh huh, sure, and she just happened to be in the way," came the deriding voice.

"I was looking at the Wall, and I'm not giving the crown to Haran. Anyway, I already decided who I'd give it to if I won."

"Then why are taking so long? Hurry up so we can have some more fun before the Festival ends!"

An expectant hush settled over the crowd as Josef stepped forward, crown in hands, and placed it on his mother's head. The crowd cheered.

"Thank you, Josef," she said, her voice soft. "You don't know how much this means to me."

"That's my boy Josef!" roared Iban. "She's the prettiest of any of 'em yet!"

The day swept onward, with games, foods and drink. The twin suns neared the top of the Wall, and Josef sought out Iban.

"Josef! Come here, boy. Let me look at you a little more before the suns set." Iban clasped the boy to him and fingered his hair. "As black as the Wall. Do you remember you father, Josef?" Josef shook his head. "His hair was as black as yours but it was coarse. Yours is silky, like your mother's. Ah yes, your mother. D'you know where she is, Josef?"

"No, Grandfather, why are you having a Festival? You don't believe in the Wall any more than I do!"

"No, I don't, but your mother does, boy. I'm doing it for her."

"But, Grandfather," Josef's eyes were swimming, "why couldn't you just wait until you had to die—you're not sick anymore!" Iban looked at Josef tenderly, understanding the anguish the youth was undergoing.

"Josef, when you're as old as I am, you get tired of waiting for death to come on its own time. And you are wrong—I'm not well; there's a sickness inside, hurting. It's better this way, Josef, believe me." Mara came up. "Ah, there you are," said Iban, "a crown in your hair and a tear in your eye. Come here, my little one, and give me one of your pretty kisses."

"Old man, it's time," said a priest.

"May the Wall guide you, Father," said Mara.

"And you, child." Iban replied tenderly, brushing a tear away from her cheek. The priest handed Iban a cup filled with red liquid and led him off.

The people were gathered along the Wall again, but were all solemn. Mara held Josef next to her and lovingly squeezed his shoulders. Iban stood at the foot of the steps in the Wall, flanked by two priests. He raised the cup he held and drained it.

"From the Wall I came, to the Wall I return!" he boomed the ritual words and started up the steps. As he reached the top, the twin suns touched the edge of the Wall and shot a rim of fire out along the Wall's length. Iban disappeared down the other side of the Wall as the suns vanished from the people's view. A low chanting began among the people, led by the priests returning down the Wall.

"From the Wall we were born, to the Wall we return. As it was in the Beginning, so shall it ever be . . ."

The moons hung low in the sky, obscured by clouds. Josef silently tied on his kirt and gathered up the bundle of food he had prepared. His eyes were red and his face puffy from tears.

I'll find out for myself what's on the other side of the Wall, he though fiercely.

"Goodbye, Mama," he whispered as he slipped past her. "I don't know if I'll be back or not." The Wall loomed above him. He started up the cold, dark steps. He whirled at a sound.

"Away from the Wall, you fool! 'Tis sacrilege to touch the Wall!" a priest hissed, drawing a knife. Josef paid no heed to his warning, and scrambled quickly over the Wall. Even in the pale moonlight on the other side, he could see the little creatures scrabbling over his grandfather's body, could see the whiteness of bone where flesh had been torn away.

"No!" he cried, his voice choked. "Leave him alone! I won't let you have him!" The creatures scurried off in to the blackness. Josef picked up the empty cup lying where the old man had dropped it and hurled it after the creatures. Tears streaming down his face, Josef took his knife and dug a grave in the cool earth. When Iban was buried, safe from the animals' teeth, Josef slept fitfully until dawn.

It had been two weeks of wandering and hunting for food when that he had brought was gone before Josef found people, a village, much like the one he had come from. A woman working the field was the first to see him. She stared at him, at his light skin, then at her own reddish color. She looked again.

"I come from the other side of the Wall," Josef called, "have you any food? I've come far." The woman's face paled.

"A god," she whispered, "a god from beyond the Wall!" She ran to the village.

"Wait!" Josef called, but she didn't stop. Moments later the village people were gathered around him, kneeling, their faces filled with awe. A priest came forward.

"We are honored by your presence, One From Beyond the Wall. Is there anything you desire from us? Ask and it is yours." Josef was speechless. They thought him a god!

"Food," he stammered, "some-something to eat."

"At once, holy one," the priest replied.

Joseph lived with the people for a month and the people were saddened to see him leave. He had become friends with many of them, even though they still thought him a god. He had learned of their other beliefs—the way they worshipped the Wall and buried their dead at its base. The souls of the dead, they believed, would, if they were worthy, ascend the Wall to live in the godsland beyond it. Death was not a happy celebration for them. They believed that their grieving and mourning helped the souls over the Wall. Josef found their beliefs strange, but when he looked back on the beliefs of his people, he found them no less strange.

"We are men but these people think us gods—yet we think the same of them and they're men too! Are there such things as gods, then?" he wondered. He felt uneasy being treated like a god, hence his decision to return home. "Even if the priests flog me for what I've done, at least there I'll be treated as one of the village people, not a god."

It was early in the night when he slipped inside his home and saw his mother sitting behind a candle, praying.

"Mama, I'm home," he said quietly. Startled, she looked up.

"Josef!" she cried. "Oh my son, my son!" She swept him to her and held him. "Every night you've been gone I prayed that the Wall would see fit to let you come back safely."

"You knew where I was?" Josef asked incredulously.

"I heard you slip out that night—I watched you climb the Wall," she said softly.

The next morning, the high priest came to their home.

"Welcome back, Josef," his kind voice said.

"You're the high priest?" Josef asked.

"Yes— the old priest held Festival a week ago." Josef was glad, because it was the old priest he had feared would flog him.

"Am I to be punished?" he asked hesitantly. The priest smiled.

"No, that you are back unharmed means the Wall has willed it this way. Come, no one else in the village knows you are here yet."

That evening, back home, Mara came and sat next to Josef.

"What was it like there, Josef?" she asked. "Is it a heaven beyond the Wall, like the Book says?" Josef hesitated. The truth, that it was no different from here, or a lie to reassure her? He took the easy way out.

"It's like the Book says, Mama," he replied.

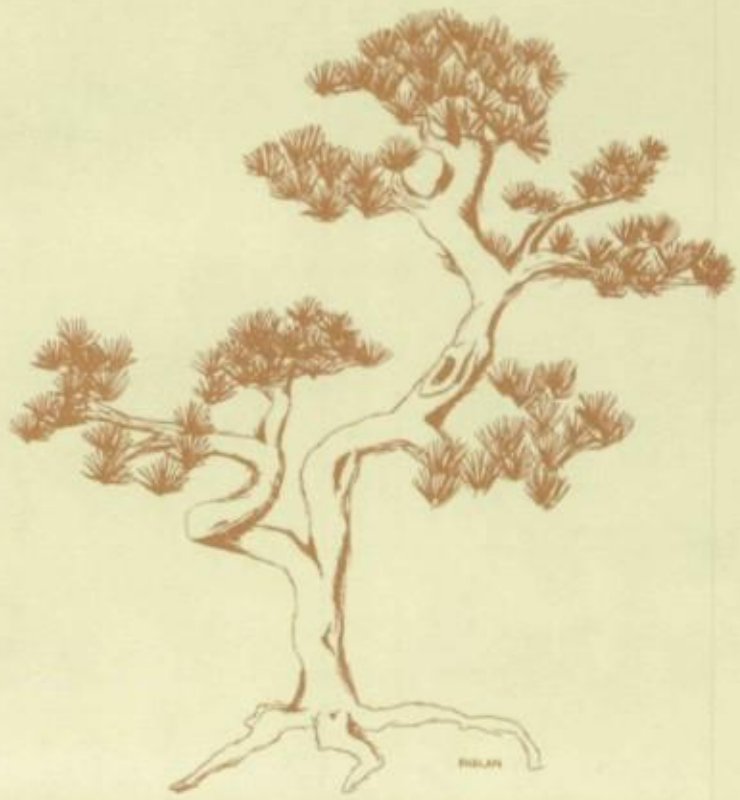
Third Place Story



The Tree

Life eases its way through young branches as last remnants of crystal snow drip away.
Encouraged by sudden warmth impatient buds venture out.
Warm air circles over the leaves in a momentary flirtation then suddenly flutters away, leaving only harsh winds and late, spring frosts.
Caught in their folly
the leaves cling for awhile as dry, brittle shells then, tumble helplessly to the ground.
There to decay
and become part of the soil that will someday feed the tree's groping roots.

Hey World! It's Me
don't you remember,
don't you know who I am?
Surely you've heard about me about my birth,
my life . . . ?

Hey World!
you couldn't have just forgotten me.
You couldn't have forgotten
all the things I taught,
all the people I touched,
all the lives I changed . . .

Hey World!
don't you remember
what I did for you?
All the pain and suffering
I went through . . . for you?
I guess you don't remember . . .
but surely you must remember what you did to me.

I love
the morning dew, ambrosial sweet, gleaming ornaments on the maple leaves.

I love
a dark cloudy day, when the air is oppressive and the sun bundles up
'neath grey blankets of thick, warm wool.

I love
a thick feather bed, nestled in the folds of sheets and quilts.

I love
the fresh-tilled earth,
sweet, rich-smelling with the promise of growth.

I love
a blazing fire,
a cozy quilt, and a good, thick book on a cold, snowy day.

I love
a pack on my back, in the high moutain air exhilarating yet calm.

I love them all for when I have them
I crave nothing more.

You May Think That I Like You

You may think that I like you just because
You thought that I was staring at you today in class.
But I wasn't.
Really, I was staring at the chalkboard and your head got in the way.

You may think that I like you just because you thought that you saw me drive by your house yesterday.
But I didn't.
Actually, I was on my way home from the store and I wanted to avoid the traffic.

You may think that I like you just because
you thought that
I was keeping Saturday night open so you could ask me out.
But I'm not.
You see, Mrs. Thompson told me last month that she might need me to babysit for her.

You may think that I like you
But I don't.

Driftwood Monarch

The driftwood lies, a proud gray heap of sand smooth bark and ancient scars.
The jagged fingers rest in sleep
Beneath the watching silent stars.

The endless sea of sand surrounds
The sole survivor of the land.
A solitary pebble crowns
The reigning monarch of the sand.

A court arises for the king
A tiny sprig of green bows down
A gift of fealty from the spring
In shadow grows below the crown.

The monarch, in his gnarled bark Surveys the sand with pitted eyes
His loyal servant shares the dark
The twisting wind around them sighs.

Beneath the hot relentless sun
The vassal gives a final bow
And sinks into the waves of dun
Beneath the sovereign pebble crown.

Majestic on his mighty desert throne
The grave and solemn ruler sits alone.

Dallas, Memphis, and the Ford Theater

The compartment he sat in was empty, and the five stained leather seats glistened in the weak light. He sat in the traditional place of a singly occupied coach, in the seat next to the window facing the engine. The train moved like a mindless beast on the steel tracks which lay before it, apathetic to its own destiny. The constant sound of its energy pounded in his head. The continual movement of the train felt as if it would never stop.

The night surrounded the train, penetrated the thick windows in his coach, seeping into the corners and jelled there. The black, seasonless expanse dotted by white scars of passing towns with neons, seemed to go to infinity, and finding no one home, returned to hold him in shadowed arms. He had always liked the night. Even as a child, he had been comforted by spreading darkness at twilight.

The passageway shed small, annoying fragments of light into his compartment. The weak beams caught the hollows in his cheeks and the shine on his oversized shoes. His dull, brown, Anglo-Saxon-type hair got nothing of it, but his eyes, wide-lidded, heavily lashed, dilated brown to black in the shaky light. The beige overcoat he wore hid the wiry frame of a runner. Next to his left arm, right below his heart, an unnatural bulge rocked gently with the metallic sway of the train.

He felt the cool metal under his coat, and recalled when that certain iciness had first become familiar. When he was twelve, and the softness in his cheeks had turned to a practiced clinched hardness, his father had given him a rifle. Loading and aiming, but never pulling the trigger, he held the long, smooth, browness in his hands every day after school. One day, when the trees had almost turned their spring to his twelfth summer, he was quietly aiming at the family dog. The pet, in middle-age, was pacing the traces of the backyard, sniffling at the latest changing winds. The sun was turning hot, and his aim was good, because the dog did not suffer much, but his shock was more from his bullseye than from the dying, kicking animal.

He chuckled to himself at the dog's death. The first time he had shot, he had shot to kill. The emptiness of the compartment made itself known, the seats leered and the many shelves and useful handles shone inhumanely. This trip seemed to go on forever, but he could feel himself coming to the end of the line, to the lit and crowded station, full of people and smoke, all waiting for their own destinies.

He looked out of his window again and caught the reflection of his face which had begun to look ghoulish, as if in horrible pain, the way his cheeks sunk in and out as he breathed. In the darkness, behind the thick glass, he realized, more than he saw, open fields of growing farmlands. The night over the planted rows reminded him of his life in the war. When he was twenty-three, he went to fight, returned three years later, still feeling the surprise of the slaughtered enemies. He remembered walking into a village at twilight, feeling it empty except for the smouldering fires of the hiding citizens. The war had not changed him; no shrapnel lay biding time in his body. His arms, legs, and oversized feet were still with him. He could still feel the warmth at the sight of human love. What had changed were his memories; they now looked at war, not as a way of life, but as a way of death.

The whistle for his destination brought him from his thoughts. He collected the single small, expensive suitcase from its shining metal rack and straightened himself in the glass reflection of the window. Leaving his compartment, he gently pushed the door closed. As he moved down the passageway, he looked casually into the other coaches, checking for any differences in their cell-like conformity. He left the train, the smoky neons of the brown and steel station pulled him magnetically to an empty bench among the rushing travellers. He read the paper he found there for hours, till dawn, then he slept, sitting comfortable, snoring softly.

At noon, pushing crowds swept him from his sleep to a taxi. The city was filled with people- lined streets, and tickertape lay like snow in the air and in the gutter. The taxi delivered him among the crowds, expectant as they, yet he waited for something completely different. Soon, as the sun left the morning behind to wait in the middle of the sky, music played in the blocked-off street, and the people cheered, and he with them. As open cars filled with smiles, black suits and waving hands passed by, he pushed to the front, his right arm tugging inside his coat. When the certain car whose occupants caused the people to jump and yell good, patriotic things passed, he pulled his arm free and aimed carefully as if he were twelve and in the backyard once again. The sun grew hot, but the shock was from death, and not the bullseye.

The crowd around him seemed to breathe all at once. When the shot met its destination, they sprang on him, kicking and punching him with feet and fists propelled by future grief. As the police took him away to some dark place, he gave a tired "Itoldyouso" smile to the weeping, tickertaped, people left alone on the midday street.

Mist covered mountains deep green flecked with gold, Sparkling blue water
fed by icy arms in shadow,
A wolf tree cuts
through puffing clouds,
I am here.
The timber comes alive,
birds warble and soar,
A skunk waddles by,
Bear turns its back to the bitter wind howling wolves gather,
I am lost.
The winds call my name
in jumbled succession, Trees grasp and cling to my presence, Animals gather drawn by stout strings, Dazed, I stumble.
No misty mountains
to veil my thought,
I have no winds
to call my name,
th puppets are gone,
timbers rot away.

Dumbbell

Alfie rolled onto his side and glanced at the clock. 2:45 a.m. He winced as he turned over to his back, feeling the day's workout. He moaned as he recalled lifting weights for a solid hour that afternoon and consoled himself with the thought that the stiffness was because it had been the first workout, and not due to his being out of shape. Though he had a trim build, Alfie had never attempted sports before, fearing his own safety. He was the guy who had the crooked nose from the time he had gotten a girl's elbow in the face when she turned around to hand him her yearbook to sign. He had once broken his ankle stepping off a curb when he spotted a ten-dollar bill in the street. All of the guys had gotten a good laugh out of that one, and had chimed in with the usual, "Could happen to anybody. Lots of guys can't handle stepping off a curb!" Alfie hadn't laughed with them though.

Excepting the nose, Alfie had that All-American boy look, blonde hair, blue eyes, and all. The girls who had never had a date with him doted on him. The ones that had been lucky enough to go out with Alfie kept their distance, though, for a number of reasons—reasons like stepping on flowing pink chiffon dresses at the prom, causing them to tear away suddenly. "A klutz like me should look before doing," he had laughed. Unfortunately, his girl hadn't seen the humor in the incident, and the dance had ended right there. Reasons like slamming car doors on petite hands, causing three fingers to break. Alfie had tried to laugh that one off too, but had gotten nothing for his efforts but a slap in the face and a large piece of a girl's mind

Alfie was hurt by the constant ribbing, especially from the girls, but he never let anyone know it. He told himself that even though they poked fun at his clumsiness, they were really his friends. He knew that they meant no harm, but he also knew that they caused plenty.

Alfie lay on his back and stared up at the blank ceiling. "Why me?" he asked aloud for the millionth time. "I'm at least as good as the rest of them." It wasn't the first time he had told himself that, either. He had made one resolution after another to prove himself to his friends, but his efforts always ended in ridicule. His first attempt was the speech team, and he had done well, until he came down with whooping cough two days before the state tournament. His hopes had been shattered once again, and laughter followed him everywhere. He then had made up his mind to make the baseball team, though he hadn't counted on lifting weights to do it.

A tear inched down Alfie's face as he thought over the day's events.

All of the usual jokes had gone around the weight room that afternoon, about what to do if Alfie dropped a weight on his foot, or if he ran into a barbell. After he had clunked himself with a dumbbell, someone had come up with the brilliant nickname of "Dumbbell" and he had had to live with it for the entire afternoon. "It'll probably stick forever," he moaned.

Alfie got up and hobbled to the bathroom for a drink. On the way back to bed, he passed his open closet, and went to close it. He noticed his hunting bow leaning in the corner. Oh no! The report on hunting! He slapped his forehead, almost crying out as he struck the welt from the dumbbell. Alfie loved to go traipsing through the woods, and had planned to write a ten-page essay on hunting weapons, from bows and arrows to modern high- powered rifles. In his exhaustion after the workout, it had slipped his mind completely. His aching body urged him to go back to bed, but he knew he couldn't. He had to keep up his grades. He switched on his desk lamp and sat down. After writing the title, he got up and opened the closet. He took out his bow and his new Winchester .308 caliber. He handled the gun with care, for it was his prized possession. He sat down at the desk and wrote. He described the weapons in detail, told of their origins, and explained their use. After writing for an hour, he stopped and picked up his rifle. Deftly, he ran his hand over the smooth stock, and carefully sighted down the barrel. Thoughtfully, he cranked a bullet in and out of the firing chamber, listening to the sound of the precision metal workings. With a start, he snapped out of his momentary trance, and glanced down at his paper "This is crazy," he muttered. "Why write a report at 4:00 a.m.? Everyone else is probably home sleeping." Why was it that they always did things right, and not him? "I think I'll write Mrs. Hofstead a note and tell her I couldn't care less about her stupid report and that she can shove it." He began with "Dear Old Lady Hofstead" but didn't get any further. He crumpled up the paper, thinking "Teachers only make you write reports to help you learn. Writing hateful notes does nobody any good."Alfie smiled at the pleasant thought, wondering where he had gotten it. A second idea hit him then, and his smile drew back into a tight-set line. "Girls," he hissed, "girls never do anything for anyone's good but their own. Julie deserved that note, not Mrs. Hofstead." He recalled his latest attempt at romance.

Last Friday's date with Julie had been a disaster. After seeing a movie, they had headed for The Parlor for ice cream and to dance a while. Julie was talking about some article she had read about life expectancy, and Alfie was conversing distractedly, trying to concentrate on his driving. As they were crossing a busy intersection, the car had stalled. For a moment Alfie and Julie had stared silently at each other. Then she had recovered and had begun to call him by every adjective in the thesaurus under "klutz" and then some, while the other drivers at the intersection started leaning on their horns with more pointed remarks. Alfie got out and raised the hood, almost getting hit in the process. Julie had run out of insults, but her fury remained, so she stomped the three blocks to the Parlor and called for a ride home. It was two hours before a thirty-five dollar tow truck dragged Alfie's car out of the intersection.

He stared at the wall in front of his desk. "Some friends," he said, fighting back his tears. "They couldn't care less about me. Who needs them? Tomorrow I'll tell them just what I think about their big mouths, and maybe bust a few of their teeth, too." He was sobbing now and continued his declaration. "I don't have any friends now, and I'll never have any. I don't want any! Feeling satisfied, he dried his tears and composed the note to Julie:

> Julie— I hate you. You'll never find anyone who will be as nice to you as I was, yet you insisted on hurting me as deeply as you could. You know that I couldn't help the things that happened. When you were talking about that article, you said that men are supposed to live for 71½ years. Well, I've been around for 17 and have seen it all, including creep girls. I never want to see you again, and hope that the feeling is mutual.
> Alfie

He reread the note. It's about time I fought back," he thought. "I wish everyone could see that note. Then they would know that clumsy ol' Alfie is never going to pull another goof again, and for sure is never going to be laughed at anymore." His determination turned to despair, though, as he thought, "It's too late to fight back. They would never do anything but laugh at me no matter what I did!"

Alfie suddenly stood up, grabbed the .308, put the mauzzle in his mouth, and pulled the trigger.

The hammer fell with a sharp click, and that was it. He slowly reached down and picked the bullet up off his desk. "I can't do anything right," he moaned. Then he added, "Thank God."

He tore up the note to Julie, turned off the light, and crawled back into bed. Finding a comfortable position wasn't easy, but he managed after a few painful tries. "I'll show those guys at workout tomorrow," he whispered as he drifted back to sleep.

Fleebus Come Home

There exists a subject that has been a pet peeve of mine for as long as I can recall. That subject is word finding—namely word finding through that hopeless conglomeration of terms upon one another, Roget's Thesaurus. The name itself brings many questions to mind. Who ever had a name like Roget? (There is strong evidence that the man's parents did.) How does one go about pronouncing it? Row-get? Rah-jet? Both seem logical, and yet neither is correct. The man insists on being called Row-jhay! Row-jhay! In my list of all the impossible pronunciations contained within this ridiculous language of ours, I would rate Row-jhay third, right behind bough, which should be spelled baow, and trough, which should be spelled troff. To me, "ough" is an unnecessary letter combination, for it causes us all confusion with our basic phonics. Also, without it people could just coff, and not worry about having to cough.

The word "Thesaurus" deserves recognition in its own right. The first time I saw the word, I thought it had to be an 80-ton, web-footed, prehistoric creature that hasn't existed for 200 million years or so. I then figured the book to be one of those day-by-day accounts of an anthropological expedition, which are as boring as lists of hard -to-pronounce words, therefore, I didn't bother reading it. My second guess was that "Thesaurus" was some ancient Roman, but I could in no way associate a Roman with Mr. Rowjhay, so I let it go at that.

The organization of the volume is worthy of Plato. It has thus far been wholly interpreted by only one man, a Mr. Fleebus Thatcher, who was a genius in my eyes, for he had single-handedly figured out which groups of words fall under the abstract headings used throughout the book to give the impression that there is indeed a place for everything. These headings include "Ideas" and "Emotions and Feelings", not to mention "Forms and Figurations." Unfortunately, Mr. Thatcher died last May and took all of his theories with him, leaving the rest of us in the cold. We are now totally incapable of comprehending the reasoning behind the arrangement of the actual globs of words to be looked up. Why would Mr. Row-jhay put "lascivious, lecherous, and carnal" under "gross?" Why not "gross, carnal, lecherous and lascivious" come under "licentious?" This is all beyond me. Wherefore art thou, Mr. Thatcher? We are in need.

Fortunately for all of us, Noah Webster, the dictionary great, never knew Mr. Row- jhay, and never read his thesaurus. Had he seen what Row-jhay has done to his lifelong efforts of organizing English into a sane man's reference book, Webster would have surely committed a grotesque murder (justifiable in my opinion) and would never have gone on to contribute to our literacy as a nation. Mr. Row-jhay wholeheartedly mocks Mr. Webster with his own aid to literature: now instead of using concrete Webster words like "merge" and "gap", young writers refer to the coming together of two things as "amalgamation" and to a space as a "hiatus". Have you ever had the opportunity to amalgamate onto a highway? Have you ever known anyone with a two-inch hiatus between their front teeth? Alas, I'm afraid that Mr. Row-jhay did, and for that reason gave up a promising speaking career and turned to writing reference books, which will be the eventual end of any remaining bits we possess of a civilized language.

—The White Mouse—

The chair grew unbearably hard, and an itch that just had to be scratched cropped up in every limb, seemingly in every square inch of hot, moist flesh. Vinny looked around her at the innumerable faces all bearing the same hypnotized expression. Pens and pencils scribbling fiercely over snowdrift white and butterfly pink, they all stared as though in a trance.

With mind dulled as though by novocaine, she squirmed and wriggled to pacify the tiny demons that were tickling her with their microscopic lances. As the teacher's voice droned on and on endlessly about Euglenas, Amoebae and Cilliates, she became increasingly aware of a minute, scratching, tearing noise. Thankful for any excuse to break the monotony, she turned her head, almost involuntarily towards the source of the faintly audible, but irritating noise. Scanning the lab tables to one side of her against the wall, she quickly noticed, registered, and dismissed several animals in cages, because they were, or so it appeared, asleep. "Obviously," she thought, "they can't take Stragel's lectures either."

Continuing her search for the irritant, her eyes fell upon a tiny cage in the corner, behind a collection of short, overweight beakers, and thin graduated cylinders which, as any fool could see, obviously had a thyroid problem. This tiny wire prison was small; indeed, it was so tiny as to have gone unnoticed by her for the four listless and extremely boring months that she had sat in that hard plastic chair, leaning on a hard plastic table, listening to Mrs. Gladys Stragel lecture to a class of blank, mindless faces on the intricacies of Microbiology from behind hard plastic glasses perched precariously on a huge, oily beak of a nose that always persisted in dripping incessantly. This malady kept Mrs. Stragel persistently pulling her tiny, hot fist out of the front of a dirty "white" lab jacket, to dab at the monstrosity on the front of her face with a tissue that looked at least four years old.

As Vinny watched, the tiny animal inside scratched furiously at the metal floor of the cage, but to no avail. Its small claws couldn't even scratch the shiny bare surface. Mrs. Stragel's voice droned on, and as it did, Vinny saw a part of herself in that tiny cage. She watched as the small white mouse slowly grew long, slender legs, human hands, a trailing abundance of dark brown hair, and an enviably clear complexion with large, doe-like eyes. The tiny human figure pounded her delicate little fists on the hard wires of the cage, and screamed at the top of her lungs, but it was little more than a squeak.

Vinny looked on with growing concern, until finally, she could no longer control herself. She pushed her chair back with such violence that it tipped over and skittered across the floor. Oblivious to Mrs. Stragel's hysterical voice screaming at her what on earth had gotten into her, and completely ignoring the faces which stared at her blankly, their mouths dropped open, not knowing what to do about the interruption in their blank existence, she ran to the lab table.

Shoving beakers and cylinders tumbling to the floor with a crash, she fumbled with the latch on the cage. She reached inside, and tenderly picked up the tiny little doll-like figure. Holding it to her cheek, she answered Mrs. Stragel's "What ARE you doing?" with the simple, blank statement that she had to let herself out.

At that moment, the blank faces turned their gaze towards the door, where the school nurse and principal had suddenly appeared, and watched as they led her out of the room, holding a white mouse to her cheek.

Mrs. Stragel walked back to her lecture podium, adjusted her glasses, dabbed at her nose, and resumed her discourse to the blank faces.
